英Ⅰ　Session1 予想問題

次の文章を読んで設問に答えよ。

I don't know how many of you have read Robinson Crusoe, but you probably know that it is an early eighteenth-century novel about a man marooned (1) a desert island who manage to singlehandedly reproduce the basics of civilization. Well not quite singlehandedly because he has the assistance of "his" man Friday after rescuing him from the cannibals. Crusoe was a model figure for many eighteenth-century thinkers, who saw (2) him the ideal individual creating culture by mastering nature. Karl Marx was (6)scathing about the way (3) which these thinkers mistook Crusoe the isolated individual as something sprung fullblown out of nowhere, or rather, out of nature. They ignored the historical processes necessary to producing something as complicated as the individual. (I am sure each of you thinks (4) yourself as an individual and as complicated, and rightly so.) "The human beings," he wrote, ". . . is not merely a gregarious [social] animal, but an animal which can individuate itself only in society." To think about human activity outside society, he continued, "is ____7____ the development of language (5) individuals living together and talking to each other." Notice that he is not denying that individuals exist. They do, of course, but ____8____.
